Peace is the coming together of things that have never really been separated.

How? Well; What if I could convince you that "I Am You"?

That central question begins your inquiry into the mysticism of identity. Your answer might reveal the peace already present in human relationships.

You presently believe that the other person is totally separated from you. For example in the physician-patient relationship there is the physician on the outside looking in on the patient's separate psychological and physiological health issues.

What difference would it make if "I Am You"? How could it have always been the case that "I Am You" without your knowledge? What happens to the experience of the "other" person if "I Am You"?

If you slowed down just enough to consider possible answers for these questions, or your own answers popped up as you read, then you have entered the mysticism and started the process of this book.

If you merely read on to have the answers given to you, then that eagerness has to be gently quieted if you intend to explore spirituality and mysticism. If you did pause to reflect, then inspecting your answers will lead you to hopeful conclusions about health and peace. These conclusions are urgently in your self-interests.
